

Abstract

Prayer is a basic religious practice. Understood as communion with God, prayer presupposes a certain awareness or experience of God. How can we apprehend this divine presence? This article deals with modern and postmodern critiques on prayer and searches for a genuine understanding of divine presence in the act of prayer. Both John Calvin and William James may serve as possible models for the reflection on God's presence.

Gerrit Immink, Groningen